Washington, December 28, 1894. Sensational statements concerning what congress would do with the currency bill when it resumes business have followed each other thick and fast this week and, although some of them were so wildly improbable that they are not worth mentioning, others had a foundation based upon truth. Among the last was a statement that the Democrats were so evenly divided that the republicans of the House would have the power of deciding whether the bill should be has been postponed from time to time agreeable and the serenade was abanpassed or not.
